Mosaic Stadium renovations in need of repair

Game-day problems. Roughriders CEO hopes stadium woes won't deter fans from the upcoming CFL season

JEFF MACKEY
jeff.mackey@metronews.ca

In last Friday's close-but-no-cigar 33-31 Roughrider preseason loss to the Calgary Stampeders, many fans in the north-side stands had more to be disappointed about than just the final score.

The new seats were part of a $14-million renovation that also included new south-end seating and large video scoreboards. This gave Mosaic more of a modern bowl-stadium layout that really changed the atmosphere around Taylor Field. Reports of seats snapping off in the north section started to surface on Twitter while the pre-season game was still ongoing. Even on Monday the north section was still littered with obvious gaps in the rows of green seats.

"Fans were disappointed and so were we; we definitely had some issues there," said Roughriders CEO Jim Hopson. "We are going to make sure that they are rectified before the next game."

Seats started snapping during a pre-season game last week. METRO

Hopson assured media Monday that all the seats in the north end will be removed and given an upgraded install before the Riders host the Edmonton Eskimos on July 8.

"The (original) installation was not appropriate and we have assurances from the supplier and from the contractor that they are going to tear it right down," said Hopson. "I understand that it (the installation problem) has to do with the weld and how it was done, but they are confident that there is a solution."

As if seats falling out from under north-side fans were not enough, some in the section were also complaining about poor sightlines to the field.

"Sightlines are an issue we can address with the moving of some of the fencing," said Hopson. "We are also keeping some seats free so we can move people if we need to."

Game-day problems were not confined to the north section, either. Hopson also admitted that there were instances of some valid tickets not scanning at the gates and not enough parking around the stadium.

Still, Hopson hopes that these negative reviews do not turn off Riders fans from attending games.

"Overall, we had a lot of positive comments. People liked the look of the stadium, the feel of the stadium, they like the new scoreboards," said Hopson. "We are absolutely trying to do our best (to fix the problems) before we lose them as season-ticket holders or game-day attendees."

Green building standards could be on the way

LEED. Environmental advisory committee compiling report on public building standards

MORGAN MODJESKI
morgan.modjeski@metronews.ca

Saskatoon could soon be one shade greener as the city looks to introduce LEED standards — that's Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design — for construction of civic buildings of more than 500 square metres.

If council approves a pending report and recommendation, construction on city buildings will aim to meet the LEED NC gold standard.

Sean Shaw, chair of Saskatoon's environmental advisory committee, was asked by the finance and administration committee to compile a detailed report on the implications of introducing the LEED standards.

"This would have a fairly significant impact on the way the city operates in constructing new buildings," Shaw said. "The recommendation we're making is that we'd like to see them reach for the gold."

He acknowledged there may be circumstances where it doesn't make sense to go for LEED gold, "but we still want to see the city hold itself to a high standard," he said.

Point of comparison

Other Canadian cities' LEED standards:
- Edmonton: Silver
- Victoria: Silver
- Vancouver: Gold
- Winnipeg: Silver
- Kingston, Ont.: Silver

Rick Morrell, executive director of the Saskatchewan Eco Network, says adopting LEED standards is a step in the right direction, adding he'd like to see the same standards in the province's capital.

"I think it's fantastic," he said. "It covers many different aspects of sustainable building and will cause the builders to learn things they wouldn't have otherwise bothered to take the time to learn."

But Bram Noble, a professor of environmental assessment in the University of Saskatchewan's School of Environment and Sustainability, suggested the change would have little impact, though it would send a message about the city.

"It demonstrates, at least to some extent, a commitment to urban sustainability," Noble said, adding that it will help manage the city's environmental footprint.

But, he warned, "It certainly is not an offset for the environmental impact of urban sprawl, increased vehicle emissions and the loss of urban wetlands."

Residential-school hearings end with birthday bash

A big party marked the end of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission's national gathering in Saskatoon to recognize all the birthdays that were missed by children who attended residential schools.

The commission provided cake, glow sticks, songs and cheers on Sunday for all of the survivors who were never able to have a happy birthday.

A stage was filled with children the same ages as many who attended the church-run schools.

The government apologized several years ago for the schools, where many aboriginal children were physically, emotionally and sexually abused.

Some of the people who attended the gathering this week said being able to celebrate a crucial part of childhood such as a birthday with other survivors was inspiring.

"I'm not alone. At residential school, you felt so alone. You thought you were the only one going through this pain," said Bernadette Neapetung. "Holding this cake ... I don't remember having a birthday."

She attended the hearings with her brother, George, who also was sent to a residential school.

"It's been a lightening of a load that I have carried for the entirety of my life," he said. "To be able to give a voice to that little boy inside of me and to let all of those things go."

He said he was struck by the children on the stage.

"I didn't know how small I really was at that time ... and it brought me back. It touched me where I have never been touched before, where I never allowed anything before."

The brother and sister said they were leaving the commission hearings as stronger people.

"I'm walking away with a hope for my children and my grandchildren. I'm proud to be a First Nations woman," said Bernadette Neapetung.

Humour prevails as ex-premier's portrait unveiled

Honoured. Calvert jokes about getting old at official ceremony

Former Saskatchewan premier Lorne Calvert joked about aging Monday at the unveiling of his official portrait.

Calvert, who led the province from 2001 until 2007, told a crowd at the legislature that just days after being sworn in as premier, he was contacted by the chief of protocol about having the portrait done.

Calvert said he was leading a minority government, trying to assemble a cabinet, dealing with a drought and looking at oil worth $20 a barrel.

"Somewhere on the extremities of my mind was the question of picking a portrait artist," Calvert recalled.

But the chief of protocol, Michael Jackson, persisted. Memos kept coming and gained urgency. "I actually phoned Michael and said to him, 'Michael, just what's the panic about this portrait?'" said the one-time New Democrat leader.

"He said to me, 'Do you want the truth?' I said, 'Well, yeah the truth is helpful.' He said to me, 'Well the truth of matter is this: We paint you early because you guys age so fast in the job.'"

"Now, I'm not sure, Mr. Premier, if you've had the same advice," laughed Calvert, turning to current Saskatchewan Premier Brad Wall, "but it wasn't all that encouraging right at the start."

Wall called Calvert a statesman and gentleman.

"You're a gifted public speaker. You're a skilled debater, not afraid to mix it up, but to do so with reasoned arguments, with humility and with a sense of humour," Wall said.

The portrait by Susanne MacKay Kaplan shows a smiling Calvert standing outside with the west wing of the legislature in the background. It was immediately displayed in the Saskatchewan Gallery, where portraits of all former premiers hang. It is the first official portrait to show a premier outside the legislature.

Calvert said that's by design.

"It was in the community of Saskatchewan that I found the greatest rewards of serving in this office," he said. "And it was my conviction and remains my conviction that all that happens within this building is only of importance as it touches the lives of those apart from this building. What matters is not so much what happens in here, but how what happens in here can better build a province."

Scouts Canada. Police not told of alleged sexual misconduct: Review

A forensic review of Scouts Canada's records reveals authorities were not contacted about at least 65 cases of alleged sexual misconduct against youths.

"We are deeply and truly sorry for any harm that has happened at the hand of volunteers that were in our organization," said Steve Kent, Scouts Canada's volunteer chief commissioner at a press conference Monday.

"We will do everything that we can to prevent such instances from happening in the future and we encourage victims to talk to us."

The accounting firm KPMG conducted a seven-month audit of the organization's files, many of which were "disorganized" and "incomplete," according to an analysis of 486 identified records provided by Scouts Canada.

The records were related to suspension and termination of volunteers for alleged sexual misconduct against youths from 1947 to 2011.

In addition to the 65 cases, there were 64 cases where it was unclear whether or not authorities were contacted.

During the review process Scouts Canada provided information about those cases to police forces, which are investigating. In 29 other cases, Scouts Canada had already contacted police. In 328 cases, police were aware of the allegation of sexual abuse before Scouts Canada.

Learning from past mistakes, the organization said it will now "rigorously" implement a new Child and Youth Safety Plan, which includes improved adult screening and training.

"Canadians can take comfort in the fact that we're confronting the past in its entirety now," said Kent.

Elliot Lake tragedy. Officials initially called off search due to concerns over a possible second collapse

Officials in Elliot Lake, Ont., say they are resuming rescue efforts at a partially collapsed mall after an appeal from Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty.

The turnabout came just hours after the search efforts were called off because it was deemed too dangerous to send crews inside. They told a news conference a plan is still in the works.

McGuinty told The Canadian Press late Monday night that he asked that any other options be considered, including using heavy equipment to dismantle the building from the outside.

The premier says if a member of his family or a close friend might have been inside, he would want "no stone left unturned," and they owe it to the families and community of Elliot Lake to give it the best shot.

Dozens of local residents protested in front of city hall after the decision to abandon the search was announced, saying it was too soon to abandon the search.

A parking lot on the roof of the shopping centre crashed two floors down into the mall below on Saturday afternoon.

Although the sound of tapping, which led rescuers to believe someone was still alive inside the rubble, stopped on Sunday morning, officials say a device called a life detector has indicated there's someone breathing inside.

Egypt. New president starts crafting government

New Egyptian president Mohammed Morsi went to work first thing Monday morning and started forming a government.

That was even before he had a clear picture of what he could do after the ruling military stripped most of the major powers from his post.

Morsi, 60, a U.S.-trained engineer from the fundamentalist Muslim Brotherhood group, is the first Islamist president of Egypt.

He defeated Mubarak's last prime minister, Ahmed Shafiq, in a tight race that deeply polarized the nation.

The country breathed a sigh of relief that at least the question of who won the presidential runoff had been resolved on Sunday, after the first free and fair elections in Egypt's modern history.

People returned to work a day after a panic that sent many home early for fear that violence might erupt when the winner was announced.

Traffic was flowing again through Cairo's Tahrir Square, the birthplace of last year's uprising and a major intersection that had been blocked for a week by Morsi supporters protesting against the military.

Hundreds may be dead after landslides

Uganda. Villages destroyed and at least 15 houses buried following torrential rain, Red Cross says

Massive landslides induced by torrential rains destroyed three villages in the mountainous district of Bududa in eastern Uganda, killing possibly hundreds of people, officials said Monday.

Disaster Preparedness Minister Stephen Mallinga said it was still too early to say how many had been killed in Monday afternoon's landslides, but officials from Bududa said the final death toll would likely be in the hundreds.

"We are sending a rescue team down there," Mallinga said. "It's very difficult to estimate how many have been killed."

Witnesses said the landslides were unexpected, happening several hours after a torrential overnight downpour that at first seemed to have done little damage.

David Wakikona, a lawmaker from the region, said most people were likely indoors when huge blocks of mud and rocks started to roll down hills, toppling homes, killing livestock and burying people alive.

"We don't yet understand how this all happened, but it's terrible," Wakikona said. "Three villages have been buried."

According to Wakikona, at least 300 people lived in the affected villages. Officials said rescue teams from the Ugandan army would play a lead role in moving the soil as the search for possible survivors begins.

The Uganda Red Cross said that at least 15 houses had been buried in the landslides. It may take time before the full death toll from such disasters is known, as often it requires rescuers working with hoes and shovels to dig through the mud and find bodies trapped underneath.

Landslides are a common occurrence in the hilly parts of eastern Uganda, and they have been especially lethal over the years in those villages where the land is denuded of vegetation cover.

Walmart Canada ramps up hiring

Expansion. Already one of Canada's largest employers, retail giant plans to hire 3,100 more workers by end of 2013

Walmart Canada is ramping up hiring amid rapid expansion in this country by the U.S.-based retail giant.

Walmart says it will open 47 hiring centres across the country as it adds a total of some 4,000 new employees this year and next, about 500 more than previously announced.

The mass retailer pays "above minimum wage," which varies by province, said Alex Roberton, spokesman for Walmart Canada, adding that employees can also participate in a profit-sharing program.

Roberton said the chain is "looking to hear" from former Zellers employees, whose experience would be taken into consideration.

In addition to the permanent jobs, the various projects are expected to generate some 10,500 construction jobs.

"We are extremely excited to be adding more than 4,000 new associates to our team," said Bob Hakeem, senior vice-president of people at Walmart Canada, using the company's preferred term for employee.

Walmart Canada pharmacies are also in the midst of a significant hiring phase.

Walmart Canada has already hired 900 employees this year, from sales associates to managers in its stores across the country, to field operations and home-office positions.

Already one of Canada's largest employers, it plans to hire an additional 3,100 workers by the end of 2013, raising its overall Canadian payroll to 94,000.

Walmart said more than half of the 73 projects will become supercentres, which offer an array of groceries as well as general merchandise. The retailer opened its first Canadian supercentres in Ontario in 2006 and has since ramped up expansion plans for the large-store concept.

- The expansion comes as competition in the Canadian retail market heats up with the entry of fellow discount retailer Target next year. Target plans to open 125 to 135 stores.

SEXISM IS NO JOKE

SHE SAYS...
Jessica Napier
metronews.ca/shesays

Every once in a while, you can count on some male comedian to drag out the hackneyed "girls-aren't-funny" routine to try and gain some attention — or, in Adam Carolla's case, sell a book.

In an interview with the New York Post last week, the comedian complained about his personal struggle (eye roll) with unfunny female colleagues. "They make you hire a certain number of chicks, and they're always the least funny on the writing staff," he whined. "The reason why you know more funny dudes than funny chicks is that dudes are funnier than chicks."

It's pretty pathetic when a 48-year-old man uses words like "dudes" and "chicks" to offer commentary on gender roles in comedy. But I suppose this is the type of enlightened discourse we can expect from the comic genius behind The Man Show, a now-defunct program that featured such classic bro-centric segments as Guess Whose Asscrack and Breast Implant Fashion Show.

In reality

"There are a growing number of female comedians disproving these sexist theories, both in front of the camera and behind the scenes."

If Carolla expects his staff writers to rely on low-brow, homophobic (GLAAD recently lambasted Carolla after he joked that the LGBT acronym should be changed to YUCK), frat-boy humour to get cheap laughs, then I'm not surprised to learn that he hasn't encountered many women who adhere to his idea of funny.

Sadly, while the backlash against Carolla's misogynistic remarks was substantial, he's not alone in his sexist ideas. The late Christopher Hitchens opined a similar argument in his infamous 2007 Vanity Fair essay titled Why Women Aren't Funny.

In the piece, Hitchens suggested that men are obliged to be funny in order to attract members of the opposite sex. "Women have no corresponding need to appeal to men in this way," he wrote. "They already appeal to men, if you catch my drift." Presumably, Hitchens' drift is that men are only attracted to women in a superficial (read: libido-driven) way. Underlying this belief is the dangerously chauvinist assumption that women are to be looked at, not heard from.

Thankfully, there are a growing number of female comedians disproving these sexist theories, both in front of the camera and behind the scenes. Kristen Wiig, Lena Dunham, Mindy Kaling, Wanda Sykes, Tina Fey, Betty White — the list of women who are funnier (not to mention more successful) than Adam Carolla is endless. These women produce and star in their own films and TV shows, they win awards, and they narrate audiobooks that will make you laugh aloud like a lunatic on the bus during your morning commute.

As for Adam Carolla, this washed-up man-child should go back to hosting his wildly successful podcast that you've probably never heard of.

The Artist

Director. Michel Hazanavicius

Stars. Jean Dujardin, Berenice Bejo, John Goodman

Passion is not normally experienced through the rear-view mirror, as regret and nostalgia are.

And yet here's The Artist, the most unlikely Best Picture winner at the Oscars in recent memory: a black-and-white, silent and exceedingly square homage to old Hollywood that is as passionate as new love.

You can call it a gimmick, as some did when The Artist premiered in competition last May at Cannes, winning star Jean Dujardin the festival's Best Actor award, a win he'd repeat at the Oscars.

But you can't fault it as smart entertainment, which eschews parody to make a sincere tribute that also serves as cogent, current commentary. In our increasingly wired world, who doesn't yearn for the supposed simplicity of the unplugged past?

The Artist isn't a conventional romance. But it's a passion project all the way, made by people with their heads in the present but their hearts in the past. Feel free to swoon along with them.

Wrath of the Titans

Stars. Sam Worthington, Liam Neeson, Rosamund Pike

After 2010's Clash of the Titans, a botched remake of the cheesy 1980s swords-and-sandals epic of the same name, there was nowhere to go but up for the next Titans flick. Wrath of the Titans, directed by Jonathan Liebesman (Battle Los Angeles), heads modestly and noisily in that direction.

Wrath has much beefier 3D and also a bulkier Sam Worthington, returning as split-personality hero Perseus. Half god and half human, he's like a Chippendales dancer without the smile.

Wrath also has stronger characters and a modestly more interesting plot: a trip by Perseus to hell and back to rescue his bearded pappy, Zeus (Liam Neeson), a full-blooded god who has fallen on hard times. At this rate of improvement, the Titans series may approach adequacy in about five years or so. PETER HOWELL

Pettyfer bares all

Magic Mike. Actor talks about psyching himself up for semi-nude dancing

NED EHRBAR
Metro World News in Hollywood

While audiences are already familiar with Alex Pettyfer after a busy 2011 — with I am Number Four, Beastly and In Time — they are about to see a lot more of him, to put it lightly, with the release of Magic Mike. Pettyfer stars as a newcomer to the world of male stripping taken under the wing of the titular Mike (Channing Tatum, who is also the inspiration for Pettyfer's character).

Stripping may seem like a daunting gig, but it turns out baring all didn't bother him as much as learning to dance.

How awkward have interviews for this film been?
I guess you kind of like dive into the fact that when you do a male stripper movie, they're going to ask you interesting questions. So you have to take everything and bite the bullet. Yes, I think the most frequently asked question is biggest wardrobe malfunction. And I think the biggest wardrobe malfunction that you have is that when you wear a thong and you have screaming girls, it can accidentally fly off. Thank God that didn't happen to me. It was during Matthew (McConaughey's) dance. It was kind of very funny.

Once you've signed up for a role like this, clearly you know what you're in for. But how do you mentally psych yourself up for it?
It's a very scary thought, one, to dance, as I've never danced before, and two — the fact that you're going to dance practically naked, you kind just wrap your head around the fact that you've got to dive into it fully. And the fact that all the other guys are in the same boat as us, doing the same thing and — apart from Channing — not having the experience beforehand, and having the experiences firsthand on the set was also very calming. I had to learn how to dance, because I can't dance. At all. To save my life. (laughs). But at the end of the day, you don't want to go to a male strip club and we're all perfect, classic dancers. What's great about the movie is that it's fun and mistakes are forgiven. It's an amazing thing to watch the flaws of a stripper because more comedy and more grime equals more reaction.

You're not playing Channing Tatum per se, but he is the basis for your character. Having him there must be...
A little awkward (laughs). It's a little awkward, yeah, because obviously he's a phenomenal dancer, for one, and you can't compete with that. And he's lived this life. But it actually really helped me, personally, because the awkwardness and vulnerability of not having experienced what goes on in this world was actually what my character had to experience, so it actually really helped.

You also had some very enthusiastic extras on set for the dance numbers.
They were phenomenal. I wouldn't really call them actresses because I think they were very, very glad to be there. On most film sets with background, you have to be like, "Give more!" And with these guys, for 12 hours straight they were screaming. It just gave us the best energy. They did get out of hand. They got out of hand with Channing, and they 100 per cent got out of hand with Matthew, because that was not planned [when they rush the stage during his dance]. I thankfully didn't have any run-ins with them. I was very fortunate not to.

So what would you say was your least favourite dance routine costume?
I mean, my favourite was my least favourite because it was the hardest thing to get off. I just wanted to get it off and go for it, which is kind of funny because the first time I stripped, I wanted to keep all my clothes on. But that's a character choice and how my character is. He eventually loves what he does. So I guess the cowboy outfit? But it was also my favourite.

Showgirls

What about that other stripper movie?

"A friend asked me if this is the male Showgirls — which it really isn't. I almost had a heart attack there. Like, are we Showgirls? Oh, f—!," says Pettyfer.

But will people draw that connection anyway, because it's a movie about stripping? Pettyfer doesn't think so.

"You follow the characters through a journey," he says.

"It just happens to be in the world of male stripping."

Robert and Kristen were 'all over each other'

Robert Pattinson and Kristen Stewart turned heads at the star-studded wedding of Hollywood producer Kevin Turen and Evelina Oboza in New Jersey over the weekend, according to Us Weekly, partying with guests until 7 a.m. and engaging in some fairly public displays of affection.

"Rob and Kristen were all over each other," a source says. Pattinson also got a chance to let loose with Andrew Garfield and Zac Efron during the reception: "There was a little area where you could go and play music," the source explains.

"Rob sang, Andrew played the bongos, Zac played the guitar. It was a whole spectacle."

Amy Winehouse and Blake Fielder-Civil

Did Winehouse want a baby with her ex?

Amy Winehouse was reportedly desperate to have a child with ex-husband Blake Fielder-Civil — even after the pair split up — Blake's mother, Georgette Fielder-Civil, told a British newspaper.

Georgette says that before her son went away for his latest prison term, he showed her letters from Winehouse post-divorce that clearly indicate their romance was far from over.

"In one letter, Amy wrote that Blake was definitely getting her pregnant within two months. She talked about conceiving the baby — which they would call Lucky — on Valentine's Day," Georgette says. "Even after their divorce Amy told Blake she'd love him forever. They carried on talking to each other until a few months before she died."

Somewhere between continent-hopping and mysterious cauldrons of soup, chef and No Reservations host Anthony Bourdain found the time to pen a graphic novel.

Part kitchen revenge fantasy, part kung-fu foodie fun, Get Jiro! includes a scene in which a man is decapitated for ordering a blasphemous California roll.

"There are people who work 60 years trying to get the same 20 to 25 pieces of classic sushi perfect, but they know they will never reach that point. That kind of drive for perfection deserves respect," Bourdain told us when we caught up with him this week in New York City.

"So when you see somebody go into a regular sushi bar and treat it like it's crap or just another meal, well, I fantasized about seeing somebody lose their head!"

We wonder what the recommended punishment would be for a sriracha sprinkle. Not that we'd ever do that. We're just wondering — for our savage friends, whose heads aren't ours.

Courtney Love is just being Courtney Love

One of Courtney Love's less destructive habits is throwing around lawsuits — in 2009, the rocker put her legal team on 14 cases in 10 months. But apparently, she forgot to pay for their many services. The rocker is being sued by her former lawyers for almost half a million in legal bills, reports TMZ.

Although she sent flowers and thank-you gifts, the suit alleges that the rare cheques bounced, and that Love used her funds to pay for a gaggle of personal assistants.

There's something refreshingly 'Courtney Love' about getting sued by your lawyer. Never change, Court.

Go meatless this summer

Food for thought. The Meatless Monday campaign is fighting to reduce global meat consumption by urging carnivores to go veggie one day a week. In the Meat Free Monday Cookbook veteran vegetarian, Beatles singer Paul McCartney, shares his favourite recipes. Here's one:

ROMINA McGUINNESS
Metro World News

It's no secret that a diet high in processed red meat can dramatically increase the risk of death from heart disease or cancer. But with the summer barbecue season in full swing, we've been gorging on burgers most weekends. Will cheese and beans ever rival the real deal? Probably not. But it's time to tackle the scary truth, one steak at a time.

This is a fantastic salad. Here it's served with tofu, but you could just as easily serve it with veggie burgers or vegetarian sausages, as well as fries and mashed potatoes.

Paul McCartney's Super Vegetable Salad

If you're looking for something other than a steak, this is the dish for you. CONTRIBUTED

1 Preheat the oven to 400°F and roast the cherry tomatoes for 10 minutes.

2 Cover the bottom of a pan with cold water and place a steamer above it. Put the broccoli, green beans, and carrots in the steamer, turn the heat on quite high, and steam for about 15 minutes, occasionally prodding the carrots with a fork to see if they are done. Some people like them slightly crunchy, others prefer them a little softer.

3 While the vegetables are steaming, make a salad with the leaves and scallions.

4 Combine the cornmeal and herbs in a bowl. Heat some olive oil in a frying pan. Dip the tofu in the cornmeal mixture and then fry until golden.

5 Whisk together the ingredients for the dressing, but only pour over at the last minute.

Ingredients

Serves 4

- 28 cherry tomatoes
- 3 florets of broccoli
- 12 green beans, cut into 1 inch lengths
- 2 carrots, peeled and sliced into 1 inch pieces
- 1 lettuce — I like Romaine
- 3 scallions, finely chopped
- 2/3 cup cornmeal
- a handful of chopped herbs of your choice
- 9 ounces tofu, cut into slices
- olive oil for frying

For the dressing

- 2 tablespoons olive oil
- 1 tablespoon red wine vinegar
- 1 teaspoon Dijon mustard (optional)
- 1 teaspoon maple syrup (if you like a bit of sweetness)

Five foods to help your skin

Yes, you still need to wear sunscreen and a hat. But protecting your skin from the sun can also be delicious.

Each issue of Best Health magazine is full of often-surprising information about nutrition for Canadians.

In the Summer issue, on newsstands now, nutritionist Allison Tannis offers a list of five foods that provide the best sun-damage protection.

1. Tart cherries. They are packed with melatonin, protecting your skin against UV rays and helping to repair sunburned skin by stimulating new skin-cell growth. And cherries' vitamin C builds collagen, helping prevent wrinkles.

2. Crimini mushrooms. Because these are loaded with the mineral selenium, which produces antioxidants in your body, they fight free radicals that form in your skin after sun exposure.

3. Green tea. This contains an antioxidant that helps ward off inflammation of the skin and neutralize free radicals.

4. Pomegranates. Their high antioxidant content fights inflammation, and reduces the ability of UVB rays to cause cancer-promoting damage in skin cells.

5. Fatty fish. Salmon, for example, is loaded with selenium and protein, both needed for skin repair. Eating fish will also keep your skin hydrated and radiant.

Why go meatless?

Why should people aim to reduce their consumption of red meat? Metro asked Meatless Monday founder, Sid Lerner, for a few reasons: "Animal fat is the villain. Red meat is high in cholesterol and saturated fat and knocking it off the menu is good for your health. Eating it in excessive amounts (a portion larger than the size of a deck of cards, more than three times week) could eventually trigger a heart disease and or, diabetes. Eating mass amounts of red meat messes up the environment. Reducing global consumption will lighten up our carbon footprint. Cutting out meat from your meals one day a week is no big deal. We even managed to get celebrity chef, Mario Batali — who is a massive pork fan — to back the campaign. With enough willpower, anyone can do it."

Does the Net handle all your finances?

Plugged in. Trying to pay a bill or cancel a card can be a total nightmare when the Internet is down — have a back-up plan

YOUR MONEY
Alison Griffiths
money@metronews.ca
Twitter: @alisononmoney

We're all pretty much tech addicts these days and nowhere is this dependency more evident than in our Internet love affair. But everyone must have a fall back plan if you lose your connection, especially for financial data. I know of what I write.

This week I lost my service for a couple of hours and it pretty much brought my work to a standstill. I couldn't access e-mail, let alone pay bills or check my calendar. I also had to contact my bank regarding a transaction. But have you ever tried to contact a specific person at a branch when you can't even locate a current phone book?

When the Internet abandons you the biggest concern is accessing your financial life. Delays could mean interest charges or other penalties.

One reader missed making his RRSP contribution when he lost service the night of the deadline. That cost him thousands in tax.

Here are four important steps you should take to protect your finances from cyber interruption.

1. Save. With programs such as Yahoo or Gmail, which are not resident in your computer, save important e-mails to your hard disk. Search the respective help programs for instructions. But I find it is even quicker to cut and paste e-bills or other important financial e-mails and save them in Word.

The advantage here is that you can make notes about when a bill is paid or add information about changing a cell or cable package, for example, with the relevant confirmation number. Assuming you back up your computer the information is easily accessible, Net or no Net.

2. Contacts. Print your contact list and make sure you have contact numbers for every bill you pay as well as for your bank and brokerage. Store it somewhere safe.

3. Inventory. Have a hard copy of all banking information including account numbers, passwords and security questions. I abbreviate the latter two for safety. For extra protection store it in a safety deposit box but be aware that if the bank isn't open you're stuck.

4. Calendar. Maintain a simple hard copy calendar or one resident on your computer noting when all bills are due. It will be a lifesaver if the Internet goes dark.

Eleanore Wells: Spinster and loving it

Lessons. Author hopes to show women that husbands and children aren't for everyone

"I love having a boyfriend. I love having him go home," says Eleanore Wells, the vivacious author of The Spinsterlicious Life: 20 Life Lessons for Living Happily Single & Childfree.

Wells has not had what many consider the traditional life. By middle age, she is unmarried and child-free. And she's sick of people pitying her for it.

"I don't think husbands and kids are for everybody," she says. "I think they're really good things to have, but lots of women, either by choice or by circumstance, are not going to have that. My belief is that you owe yourself a good life, no matter what your circumstance is. ... I'm living proof, because I have a fantastic life."

Having been a source of inspiration to her other single friends, Wells decided to outline, in her book, all of the benefits of singledom. Her points are not aimed at rejecting coupling, but at leading a full life while alone, which can also lead to being not so single anymore.

"You can certainly figure out a way to celebrate all the other good things that are going on in your life," says Wells.

"And happy people often attract other people."

Eleanore Wells. HANDOUT

The 'Spin'

Pearls of Wells' wisdom:

• If your ex was a jerk the first time around, he'll still be a jerk next time around: "If (your reason for breaking up the first time was) personality — or behavior-related — he was a jerk, he wasn't nice, if he was mean, if he cheated — you know those are four things that kind of say something about the person. Don't go there."

• You can't force chemistry: "I think you kind of know relatively quickly whether you are drawn to someone. ... I don't think you can fake that. I don't think you can force it. So, there was a time when I would meet, you know, what we would call your 'standard nice guy,' and I'd feel nothing and I'd say, 'Oh, but he's so great, he's a good person! I should be attracted to him. I should want to date him.' It doesn't work."

• Babies aren't for everybody: "There's almost nothing else you can do in life that you can't take back or change in any way. Having a kid is (one of those things). You have to be 100 per cent all the way in, and so if there's doubt there, I think you should wait until there is no doubt.

How to socialize your boyfriend and not be annoying

askcharlesthebutler@metronews.ca
For more, visit charlesmacpherson.com

Dear Charles,
I have to admit that the man I chose to be my boyfriend has some traits that I would prefer he did not possess. OK, I admit it: I think he has bad manners. For example, he has a habit of forgetting to ask for his water without ice at restaurants. At the end of the meal, he wants to drink water without ice, so he scoops ice out with a fork or a spoon and puts it in his empty plate. Then he drinks the water. Sometimes I try not to let it bother me, especially when we're in a really casual restaurant. However the other night he did it in a small, fancier restaurant, and I could see people looking at him. How do I socialize my boyfriend without being an annoying girlfriend who is overtly trying to socialize her boyfriend? I've tried to model ordering water without ice (even though I prefer ice) but he doesn't get the hint. Rolling my eyes and being annoyed when he does stuff like that is more effective at getting him to stop, but I don't like acting like that.
Stressed Girlfriend

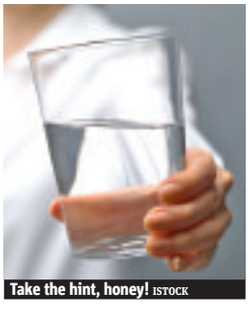
Dear Stressed Girlfriend,

I'm a firm believer you must deal with this issue head on and sooner rather than later, so how do we do this?

Firstly, not in public, nor in front of a waiter, pick a private place when it is just the two of you. Once alone, I think I would just come right out and say, "You know John, I've noticed that when you pick the ice out of your glass, people at the tables around us are staring at you, and it is making me uncomfortable. Would you please do me a favour and when you order water, can you please order it without ice?"

The reason I like this method is because it tells him about others who have observed his behaviour and as his girlfriend, how this makes you uncomfortable.

Please let us know how it goes! Fingers crossed!



Take the hint, honey! ISTOCK

NHL. Star players align ahead of CBA negotiations

Soon Jonathan Toews, John Tavares, Shea Weber, Shane Doan and 50 other NHLers followed — as sure a sign as any about how seriously members of the NHL Players' Association are taking their last set of meetings before negotiations begin on a new collective bargaining agreement.

NHLPA executive director Donald Fehr has repeatedly talked about how important it is for a wide variety of players to be engaged in the process. Now he's reached the moment of truth — formal CBA talks with the NHL will begin "very quickly" after this session ends Wednesday, according to Fehr.

Former Wimbledon champ Venus Williams ousted

Tennis. Williams was diagnosed with an autoimmune disease last year

Racket bag slung over her shoulder, resignation written across her face, Venus Williams weaved through fans milling about on the sidewalks that players must traverse to get from Court 2 to the Wimbledon locker-rooms.

The 32-year-old Williams had just absorbed a lopsided first-round loss at the Grand Slam tournament she once ruled, a poor performance that raised questions about how much longer she will keep playing tennis while dealing with an energy-sapping illness.

She trudged by as her hitting partner, David Witt, was saying: "It's tough to watch sometimes. I think everybody sees it. I don't know what else to say."

Looking lethargic, and rarely showing off the power-based game that carried her to five Wimbledon titles and seven majors overall, Williams departed meekly Monday with a 6-1, 6-3 defeat against 79th-ranked Elena Vesnina of Russia. Only once before — as a teenager making her Wimbledon debut in 1997 — had Williams exited so early at the All England Club.

Still, Williams said she'll be at the London Olympics next month and is "planning" to be back at Wimbledon next year.

"I feel like I'm a great player," Williams said.

Historic CFL season has plenty of drama

The 2012 season will be a nostalgic one for the CFL as it marks the 100th anniversary of the Grey Cup.

But after a busy off-season, there will be plenty of drama for football fans long before the historic championship game is played in November.

The season opens with four new head coaches across the league, slotback Andy Fantuz playing closer to home and longtime West Division quarterbacks Ricky Ray and Henry Burris renewing their rivalry in southern Ontario.

The Winnipeg Blue Bombers and Hamilton Tiger-Cats, meanwhile, will bid farewell to their longtime stadiums at the end of the season while B.C. Lions veteran receiver Geroy Simon is on the verge of a major milestone.

"There were significant changes in the off-season," commissioner Mark Cohon said in an interview. "I think all these stories build great momentum for us in 2012."

Burris and Fantuz will both make their Hamilton debut on Friday when the Tiger-Cats host Saskatchewan. The Ticats acquired Burris from Calgary but the game will be especially significant for Fantuz, a native of Chatham, Ont., who spent his first six CFL seasons in Regina before signing with Hamilton as a free agent this off-season.

The game will also mark the CFL head-coaching debuts of Hamilton's George Cortez and Saskatchewan's Corey Chamblin, a former Ticats defensive co-ordinator. THE CANADIAN PRESS
